

Sinclair Broadcast Group's planned airing of the documentary "Stolen Honor" on its 62 television stations across the country is a blatant use of the public airwaves for an hour-long campaign ad masquerading as news. That a large corporation which is a substantial contributor to one political party would order their local stations to preempt all regularly scheduled programming just one week before a presidential election in order to run an extended attack on the other party's candidate is a perfect illustration of the grave dangers of media consolidation. It is the job of the Federal Communications Commission to protect the American public from just such abuses.
